Silence in such cases is supposed to arise, either from a disregard to public opinion, or from a conscious inability to satisfy it; on the other hand, a defence is a flattering appeal to the judgment of the public. While many will be unable to detect the false logic of the defence, the partisans of the government will insist that the argument is irresistible, and pour obloquy on all who fail to acknowledge its force. The Rev. gentleman who at the last anniversary began his speech with declaring that there was no occasion for an apology for the Society, and concluded with the exhortation never, never apologize, evinced more impulsive zeal than sound judgment. The Society had been arraigned at the bar of the public for its avowed neutrality on...
